The World's Fair Had on a Full Cur-

As evening grew nigh the wind died out, the sprinkling carts came out to lay the dust and the crowds began pouring into the park. The cen-ter of attraction was the grand basin, where the climax of electric glory is to be seen. All the colors of the rais bow were thrown on the rising waters of the electric fountains on each side of the MacMounies fountain and the balus trade bordering the basin was lined every inch of the distance with the admiring throng. An additional attraction lending Venetian poetry to the enchanting scene was furnished by the lows state band playing on a float which rested in the middle of the basin. The Cincinnati and Chicago bands also added instrumental melody to the occasion. All the great search lights were in operation throwing con-cal shafts of light long distances from the roofs of manufacturers and agricultural buildings and music hall on the various illuminated parts of the exposi tion, principally administration build-ing with its gilded dome flaming with gas torches and bands of incandescent

IS A BRIGHT PUP.

He Held the Express Wagon Against All Comers.

I heard an amazing dog story a day or two ago, and, though it was told to me by the owner of the dog. I shall repeat it as a fact. When that able journalist, who is known in Boston as Jim Clarke, left. the city of culture, and, bringing a large share of culture with him, came to New York to engage in the practies of his profession, he arranged with great care for the transportation of his handsome St. Bernard dog. Leo. Les is not as big as a cow, but he wears more teeth, especially in his upper jaws and when Mr. Clarke first med itated intrusting him to an express company he could not wholly repress a doubt as to which of them would be carrying the other when they arrived in New York. Mr. Clarke has a deep effection for this noble animal, and he feared that the brass in an express messenger's buttons might make Leo sick, so he thought out a scheme by which the danger to the dog could be averted. He decided to have the dog brought on in his kennel. So the signting roof was taken off; heards were nalled sorous; and when Lee had been induced to enter, sints were nailed across the door. In this way Lon traveled safely, and nothing of importance happened until a gigantie express wagen, bearing the dog and kennel, was drawn up before the door of Mr. Clarke's house in arose: How was the dog to be got our of the wagon? Only two men had been sent with this unusual package, and they could not lift one corner of it. Mr Clarke was not at home, and there was no man in sight who could be hired to

The expressmen made sobs experiments with the hearnel and succeeded in jolting it about a little. Lee resented this assault upon his dignity with a growl that shook the earth. The small boy who is always present on such an occasion, heard this sound, and in the usual mysterious manner immediately summoned one hundred other boys to whom he communicated the startling information that there was a liou in the box.

"It's a nonv." said one. "he's a-kick-"It's a pony," said one, "he's a-kick-

Beveral men stopped to see what was the matter, and one of them expressed the opinion that it was not a lion but a bear. He got up into the wagon to verify his statement, whereupon Leo growled once more, and the man went out over the tail-board without being very particular as to which end of him got to the ground first.

The expressmen, meanwhile, were in the house consulting with Mrs. Clarke. When they came out the crowd had doubled. They had deckled to knock off the slats from the door and let Leo make his own exit. While this was being done the people in the front rank of the crowd tried to get back, and those behind tried to get forward, so that they all stepped on one another, and there was great noise and con

This rumpus increased the nervous ness of the dog, and he began to bark in a terrific manner. The men removed two of the slats, and then Leo removed the other slats and also the the men. One of the expressmen got under the wagon sent, and the other went out over a wheel. Lee had the wagon all to himself, and he could have had the street if he had evinced any desire for it.

But he didn't; and right there arose a new difficulty. The dog wouldn't come down. Mrs. Clarke called to him but he was so excited that he did not notice her. He remained in the wagon and addressed the crowd with his thundering bass.

Then came a volley of suggestions. Everybody knew just how the dog should be induced to come down. "If somebody gets up into the wager and coaxes him a little," said a tall, thin man, "he will jump down all right." "Suppose you do it," said one of the

The thin man said that he had a family dependent upon him, and the crowd jeered. This made the man angry, and he climbed into the wagon. Then he climbed down again very fast to ask Mrs. Clarke whether the dog had a habit of eating between meals. She admitted that he sometimes grawed

"Go ahead then," yelled a small boy to the thin man, "you're just what he wants." Whereupon the thin man in wrath pursued the small boy, and did not come

The Man Who Knows It All arrived at that moment, and ridiculed everything that had been attempted. "Give me a piece of meat," said he.

"and I'll show you what to do." Nobody had any meat to spare. The expressman who had experimented with the rope said that he had already contributed a small piece, and he thought it was somebody clac's turn 'Here," said the Man Who Knows It All to a butcher's boy who was in the crowd, "lend me that piece of meat in your basket."

"Lend it to ye?" said the boy. "Whadje givin' us?" "I won't let the dog have it," said the Man Who Knows It All; "I'll just show it to him." "Rats," said the boy. "If he wants it, he'll come an' take it, an' don't yer make no mistake. Yer wouldn't be in it with no such doe as him, see?" "What's the meat worth?"

"Fifty c.," replied the boy promptly. "Well," rejoined the Man Who Knows It All, "I give you half a dollar if the dog in lures it. "Give it ter me first," said the boy,

"I aint takin' no chances wid ver will. Yer may not have that much ter leave.

"You're an insolent hound," said the Man Who Knows It All. "Yer ain't got no mon," said the boy, derisively. "I'm onter yuse. This inference was too painful for the Man Who Knows It All. He passed out half a dollar in a hurry and received the meat "Doggie, doggie," said he, approaching the wagon. "Here's a nice piece the trouble will come when he shots it." The doctor was a brave man and he got into the wagon without hesitation. There was just room shough for him and Leo and the kennel

Lee elevated his upper lip. He kept right on raising it. The lip went up like a curtain in a theater, and the scene it disclosed was all teeth. The doctor's mind was slightly decomposed by this spectacle. In fact he could think of only one thing, and that was the problem: How is it possible for a dog with such large teeth to have so many of them? There appeared to be a hundred or more on each jaw. The doctor stood there and thought about

Meanwhile half a dozen of the bolder spirits in the crowd had been so interested in the doctor's experiment that they had climbed up on the sides of the wagon. Leo heard them all around him. He is a dog with an exceptional ly mild disposition, but there is limit to his patience, and that limit was reached at the moment in question. Leo was in a condition to bite for business. He opened his mouth till it looked like the entrance of a cave, and every hair on his body stood up straight as a nail.

Then the air seemed to be full of feet. There was a fringe of them entirely around the wagon, for all the men on its edge had gone off head first. Nobody was bitten but everybody was satisfied. The dog could keep the wagon if he liked it; he could have it all.

Just then there appeared Mr. Clarke's youngest son, Taylor. "Hello," he said: "Leo's come "Don't ye go near him," said the crowd. "Nonsense," said Taylor. "Who's scart of old Leo? He won't bite any-

He climbed up over the wagon wheel and nobody could stop him. Every-body drew a long breath. Taylor, between two slices of bread, would not make a sandwich for Leo, and the chances that the dog, in his present frame of mind, would recognize the boy, seemed very small. But when Taylor had got into the wagon, good old Leo put out his tongue-which is as big as a snow shovel-and licked the boy's face and hands with every indication of delight. Then Taylor jumped down from the wagon, and the dog followed him. They moved toward the house in a inne formed by the heels of people who were getting out of the way. They had more room than the Columbian land parade, and Leo could have had twice as much by simply asking for it.

"The expressmen couldn't make him get down," said Mrs. Clarke, when her 303 and Leo were safe in the house.

"What do men know about managing a dog?" said Taylor. "It takes boys for that." Howard Freigna Digging Their Own Graves.

"Thousands of people right in this city are digging their own graves. They are hurrying themselves to the cemeteries. They think they have simply a bad cold in the head or a sore throat, when in reality they are walking about with catarrh-the forerunner of consumption. If they only knew the years of misery they might save themwives they would strangle the disease in its infancy. Delay is dangerous; besides it requires a hard fight to eradicate the disease rom the system when it is allowed to run for years. This is the test time of year to cope with catarrh, because there is less tendency to catch cold and irritate the influenced mucous membranes. Humantty is alike the world over-people keep putting off and putting off seeing what is the matter with them, and where they might be cured for a few dollars they wait until the catarrh has poisoned the cutire system and takes longer to be cured. So that procrastination not only the thicf of time but it is the thief that role the sufferer's pocketbook."
